HOW THE HOUSE CAME TO BE PURCHASED

THE following narrative, giving an account of what led to the notion of purchasing the House, and of the various steps taken to effect the purchase, has been communicated by Mr George A Lumsden, formerly of Manchester. Those responsible for the publication of this book, whilst feeling that the narrative deals rather severely with the opposition which the movement at first encountered, are of opinion that everything ought to be told as it presented itself to Mr Lumsden's mind, and they have accordingly refrained from making or suggesting any alteration in his communication

In April, 1894, I had occasion, after an absence of eight years, to visit London, and having transacted the business that took me there, I determined to see Carlyle's House in Cheyne Row, Chelsea. Some nine years before that, I had endeavoured to see the House, but subsequent reading had convinced me that the house I had looked at was not Carlyle's at all. My wish to see the House when opportunity offered, will be easily understood by most of those who are likely to read this narrative. The almost instinctive reverence of the youthful tyro of 1885 had, through the diligent perusal of Carlyle's works, developed into a deeper reverence in the man of 1894. I wished to see Carlyle's House because one of England's greatest men had lived and worked in it, the man whose influence upon my own life had been, in many important respects, determinative.

On Sunday morning, the 8th of April 1894, I took boat at Westminster, and landing at Chelsea, made first for the Boenm statue of Carlyle in the Embankment Garden. A little inquiry (to those familiar with the fact that the statue stands just at the southernmost end of the Row, inquiry may seem superfluous) brought me to Cheyne Row. I looked at No. 24. All was dingy and dirty, the windows particularly manifesting those signs which one usually associates with an empty, neglected house. There was no intimation anywhere as to whether it was for sale, or whether it was to let. The curiosity I felt did not prompt me to hazard an inquiry at the House itself—why I cannot quite explain. The place repelled me rather than anything else, and seemed the fitting accompaniment of all the malvolent abuse that has been heaped upon Carlyle since his death. To me whatever his state or circumstances, it was still no ground, but I could not bring myself to knock at the door just then, and as there was nobody about the street to whom a question might have been put, I turned away, not gaining any information. I walked back towards the City through lordly streets, through Hyde Park and many other places likely to emphasize the discrepancy between the splendour of living manhood, and the squalid neglect of the modest old house which had been the abode of greatness.

Inquiries made later that day were altogether fruitless, except that a faint hint did perhaps reach me that the House had been for some time, and then actually was, inhabited by a woman whose conduct had scandalized the neighbourhood, and brought her into collision with the Chelsea Vestry and other authorities. The complaint was that the House had been converted into a kind of home for dogs and cats, and that they had become a nuisance and a danger to a considerable circle of neighbours.

On returning to Manchester, I wrote to Professor Froude, imagining that he at any rate ought to know something about the House. In a few days he replied, with perfect politeness, that he did not know who occupied or owned the House, that it ought to have been made national property, but that there were difficulties of various kinds into which he need not enter. It was impossible not to think of the last words of his "Life," and to wonder whether the difficulties had been fully faced, and found altogether unconquerable, by him and others. Meantime I had mentioned my anxiety about the House to my friend, Mr Alfred Miller, the only man of my acquaintance upon whose entire sympathy with me in the matter I could depend. After various consultations with him, I endeavoured to find trace of the Carlyle Society which had placed the tablet in the wall of the House, but could discover only a Carlyle Working Men's Club. The secretary of the latter, on being rather urgently appealed to, wrote, promising to make inquiry, to send my letter to so-and-so, and generally to bestir himself, but nothing came of that, and finally I approached a London friend, begging him to ascertain how matters actually stood with regard to 24, Cheyne Row.

After a little time, and a rather disconcerting interview with a woman at the House, presumably a servant of the objectionable tenant, and interviews with various other people, my friend did get to know something about the tenant, and the name and address of the proprietor. He also paid a visit to the proprietor's representative, and startled us by the announcement that the tenant's lease would expire in September following, and that the owner was then negotiating the sale of the property to a solicitor for £1,750. This, if true, was rather alarming for the idea had now taken firm root in our minds that an effort ought to be made to have the House bought (provided it was for sale) by Carlyle's admirers. We must act immediately. I wrote to a prominent member of the Carlyle Society, London, whose address had been ascertained by my friend, detailing all the circumstances then known to me, and expressing the hope that something might be done. His reply discouraged the notion that the Society would take the matter up, and expressed or implied grave doubt as to whether it would be possible to find a sufficient number of people to combine for the purpose of purchasing the House. Foiled here again, I then wrote to Sir Charles Gavan Duffy, and meantime Mr Miller and I resolved to visit London, to ascertain all we possibly could, and (being now rather sceptical about receiving anything like effective support from quarters where we could have reasonably expected to find it) in the event of being able to obtain from the proprietor the option of purchase for a given time, to write a letter to the "Times." Mr Miller preceded me to London, and, just as I was starting a reply came from Sir Charles Duffy, intimating that "when anything practical could be done, the matter would always be of interest" to him,—a statement which rather discouraged any further approach then, but the implied support was ultimately received

On the morning of August 18th, after an all-night journey to London—it happened to be a waste of time, but an economy in money, to travel with such a degree of slowness—I met Mr Miller outside St Paul's Cathedral. There, as we sat together, amid the friendly tame pigeons, and screened from the roaring traffic, he listened to the letter I had drafted for the "Times." His opinion was very definite the letter would give offence to certain sections and persons, presumable supporters, and our object necessitated the conciliation of as many as possible. Then we saw our correspondent, the member of the Carlyle Society. He promised support to our project, but looked quite incredulous of its success. Next we went to the proprietors representative, and in a dingy, dusty corner, with an old soiled "Illustrated London News" before us, containing a portrait of Carlyle, the important interview was opened. Yes, the tenant's lease was expiring in a month, the proprietor would sell for £1,750, and would give an option of purchase for a month. We were also informed that about a year before, some correspondence relative to the desecration of the House had taken place in the "Daily Chronicle." We proceeded at once to the "Chronicle" office, ransacked the file, and found in the issue of September 5, 1893, an article headed "A Desecrated Shrine," which we perused with painful eagerness. The article, excellent in all respects, and especially as a testimony of its writer's regard for the memory of Carlyle, and as regards his indignation at the state into which the House had been allowed to fall, was followed in immediately subsequent issues by several letters. These were unanimous on the question of the degradation and the necessity for an alteration, but it did not appear that the writers had ascertained whether they could either lease or buy the house and the simple but vitally important consideration that the first thing to do was to bind the owner before a hue and cry was raised, which might induce him to raise his price, seemed never to have occurred to any of them. The matter gradually dropped the writers had apparently discharged their conscience by a letter to a daily newspaper.

Leaving the "Chronicle" office, we made our way to Chelsea. As we were approaching the house, a lady and gentleman were admitted. On our reaching the door a moment later, they were coming out. They could hardly have got beyond the lobby. I felt inclined to turn away but Mr. Miller, taking a sudden resolution, stalked up to the closing door, and addressed an ugly dirty female face still visible behind it. Certainly we could enter and we entered accordingly. Up the old staircase, through several of the rooms, up to the attic study,—all was waste, desolation, and dirt, gas fittings half torn down, no furniture whatever visible. Our inspection lasted only a few minutes, and not a word, beyond an ejaculation of dismay, was uttered. I felt unable to put any question to the slattern, and left Mr. Miller following. As soon as we were outside he hinted that we had made a mistake in not 'getting to know something more.'

We had made no mistake. We had got to know enough. We had received ample confirmation of what we had been told and one of us at least had formed a definite resolution—that an effort to save the house must be made. That had become no matter of expediency or otherwise, it had become a matter of conscience. Later when the purchasing of the House came rather prominently before the public some ingenious people said, what a happy idea to buy the House as a centenary memorial—but there was no notion whatever about a centenary memorial in the matter. The centenary was a lucky accident of which advantage was taken later and the thought of it did not in the very smallest degree influence the action either of Mr. Miller or of myself.

After a further survey of the whole matter, and the consideration of what was immediately to be done, Mr. Miller and I parted, he going further south, I returning to Manchester. It was decided that the letter to the "Times" should be sent at once, or rather as soon as I had received the option of purchase, and that it should contain a paragraph boldly announcing the opening of a subscription list. This meant giving a name and address and as, for reasons of no interest to any reader, mine could not be quite conveniently given, Mr. Miller's was chosen. On getting back to Manchester, I rewrote the letter, eliminating or altering the passages that Mr. Miller conceived might give offence, added the announcement of a subscription list and sent it off to the editor of the "Times" with a note craving its publication. The "Times" newspaper has been known to publish strange letters in its time—some of them not genuine letters at all—but it could not accept this one of mine which was at least genuine, and related to a matter that one might presume of sufficient interest for publication in the newspapers, the editors of which consider that their occupation has some real connection with literature. After three or four days—days of grace, which I told the editor would be given him—I again rewrote the letter, despatching it to the "Daily Telegraph" Four days more, and nothing came of it We had not provided fully for this contingency Mr Miller was still in the south of England, I just going to Scotland, time was running on, and still no publicity After some intricate correspondence, we decided upon the "Standard" Again I re-wrote the letter, and to the private note to the editor of that paper, I added a sentence to the effect that if he feared the letter was written by some one in collusion with the owner of Carlyle's House, I could and would adduce testimony as to my personal character, hinting at the same time that perhaps the letter itself, if properly examined, would be found the best refutation on that particular point I state this detail here, because I never wrote words with greater reluctance, or with so great a sense of the mean necessities under which a man may have to work. Mr Miller believed that the other editorial gentlemen might have been deterred from publishing by some suspicion of the kind referred to, and I was not to endanger our project by a personal disinclination to produce an assurance that, as regards Carlyle's house at any rate, I was "above suspicion"

Two days later, Mr Miller telegraphed me, then in a remote corner of the island, that the letter had appeared in the "Standard" — Thursday, September 6, 1894 After many months of secret incubation, the formless had assumed form, and was alive before the world I immediately telegraphed and wrote to some seven of the best known provincial papers, requesting them to copy the letter, or otherwise give publicity to what it advocated—in appeal which was responded to by only one or two of them Next morning's mail brought Mr Miller only two letters—one from

Mr A G Humphry, promising a subscription, and one from Mr B E Pemberton, Solicitor, who, having some time previously had occasion to inquire about the House on behalf of a client, was possessed of certain information that might be useful and meantime he warned us against buying a lawsuit along with the property

The following days brought a few further communications, and only a few Matters seemed about to stagnate utterly, when, on my return to Manchester, it was determined to make an effort to compel the attention of the press Armed with a list of the newspapers published in the three kingdoms, we set to work, printed a letter, with a note addressed to each editor, and suddenly, on the 19th of the month, launched some 450 all over the country We imagined that a certain proportion of them would get inserted, sufficient to give us wide publicity any way and in point of fact the effect was considerable Even the "Times" gave a curtailed edition of the letter, and, as we speedily learnt from the cuttings sent us by the agency engaged for that purpose, comments were abundant All these were perused carefully, although hardly one deserved for its own sake a moment's consideration One was met at every turn by the perverse ignorance and the shallow impertinence that characterize almost all the expressions of opinion one hears respecting Carlyle The article quoted below may be regarded as typical It is thoroughly prosaic, thoroughly ignorant of the real significance of Carlyle and some other things, and has all that astonishing imperviousness to any glimmering of an idea that its writer might be wholly mistaken and talking rather discreditable nonsense In his reference to the possible available memorials the writer of the article might have spared his attempt at "smartness,"—that most wretched kind of wit, and in this instance scandalously applied, as those who view Carlyle as I do, will agree with me in thinking, for every letter published by authority of Mr Miller and myself contained the assurance that full particulars would be given on application. The reader will glance at the Catalogue, and perhaps think how contemptible all this about "blotting pads," etc., and the "old man's grumblings," really looks now.

The article reads

"Some well meaning people are attempting to acquire, and to set apart for ever, as a national possession, the house in which Carlyle died. There is also talk of making a Carlyle Museum—of what? The slippers he used to wear? The pipe he used to smoke? A portion of his last blotting pad? Echoes of the old man's grumblings? I do not think that we want a Carlyle Museum, and I have great doubts on the subject of buying the house unless some rich man comes forward. Of course, we ought to keep all the houses of all the great writers, but it seems hardly likely that a people who a few years ago suffered Milton's house to be pulled down will concern themselves to preserve Carlyle's. Moreover, I understand that the younger generation does not read Carlyle. He was a mighty power in the land forty years ago, all men over fifty and a great many over forty can bear witness to the influence of Carlyle's writings upon their own minds. Among his disciples were Maurice and Charles Kingsley. His 'Past and Present,' his 'Sartor Resartus,' his 'French Revolution,' undoubtedly lifted men's minds out of the conventional groove in which they were living, and brought them back to the realities of things. In those days the younger and the more generous souls revelled in the teaching of Carlyle. But, is his teaching still a source of inspiration for the young men? I doubt it. Generous souls there are still among the younger men, of that we must never doubt, but they find no other food. Perhaps Carlyle's ideas have already been assimilated. Perhaps for the time being his work is done. He is lying on the shelf unread. He will certainly become a Classic—he will be read again by the next generation, when the history of this century can be written the influence of Carlyle will be treated in a long and important chapter. But about the purchase of that house? As for me, I shall not send my mite for this object, because, though I am old enough to have been educated by Carlyle, I have never at any time entertained any personal feeling, any affection for the man apart from his works.

"There are some authors—among the living as well as the dead—of whom one would gladly learn everything and preserve everything, one would collect their furniture, their books, their letters, their pictures, and the merest trifles that ever belonged to them. These are the authors whose writings make the world love them—not the best authors, perhaps, but those who have the power of making their personal qualities felt in their work. Other authors run in to us, in spite of admirable work, abstractions, perhaps they repel us. Considering how much of a man's real mind gets into his books, there must be something disagreeable in an author who communicates a repellent image of himself. I should like to tell in these columns with what affection I regard certain living writers and with what repulsion I regard others. But these names can only be whispered. Consider, however, the dead. With what deep and personal love does one regard Addison, Steele, Fielding, Goldsmith, Cowper, Lamb, Shelley, Scott, Dickens, Mrs Gaskell! Why, they are one's own close friends. Does one desire, however, a closer acquaintance with Pope, with Wordsworth, with Walter Savage Landor? I would invert the line of Leigh Hunt—whom we regard with a kindness somewhat contemptuous, as if he didn't signify. He said, 'Write me as one who loved his fellow men.' Speaking as a humble author, I should ask no better gift, no greater success, than this—'Write me as one whom all his fellows loved.'

The above appeared in the "Queen" of September 29, 1894. the name of the writer is Walter Besant.

Men to whom every word of criticism and comment of that kind, and such self-satisfied, self-assured prosing, were detestable, were not likely to be driven from their purpose by any conceivable number of articles of that stamp. Only men half convinced could be frightened by such stuff. And our steady resolution from the first was to fight it down, if fighting it down were possible. I need not enlarge on this particular phase of the difficulty we had to overcome, for, if it covered a large space, it was always the same. The strangely misnamed paper called "Truth," with its "utterly idiotic," Sala with his "cheap notoriety hunters," and an anonymous creature whose rabid abuse could not exhaust itself in less than three languages,—it was all very painful—it threatened to be serious, but it did not for a single instant make us think of capitulation. Only the demonstrated impossibility of finally succeeding would have made us do that, and we were yet a long way from having exhausted all our resources. Indeed, this kind of opposition had rather the effect of stimulating us to greater activity, if possible, for whilst the thing we felt bound to do was to attempt the saving of Carlyle's House, without regard to the effect it might produce, this ignorant abuse gave a superadded inducement to persevere, when we considered that the mere rescuing of the House would be a rather emphatic protest against all that. And at this moment, I believe the saving of the house will do much more for Carlyle's memory than some of the abundant biographies and monographs that have appeared in recent years. It is a plain and deliberate announcement that the minds of certain people have never wavered, and that to them Carlyle's significance and greatness are still very clear.

Before the newspapers had ceased commenting, we had got from Mrs. Alexander Carlyle (Carlyle's niece) the promise of a considerable number of articles of the old furniture. We had Mr. Pemberton ready to undertake without reward the intricate legal work probably involved. We had managed to secure an extension of the option of purchase. With these three definite things, we began operations in a new direction. It was evident that as publicity alone was bringing only very little support, our hope now lay in the formation of a powerful Committee. We already had the name of Dr R. Spence Watson, and it did excellent service. For two months we wrote far and near to all likely and desirable men, especially to men of any public note who had been in some measure associated with Carlyle, or who might be presumed to have an interest in him. We wrote long letters, short letters, all kinds of letters, some almost entreating, some intimating rather openly to their recipients that they seemed to us to have a duty in this matter. The result was a series of surprises. Certain men and families from whom we had looked for help with some confidence, would not say a word, others were lukewarm, many (particularly literary men of a certain class) were haunted by the dread of failure, only a few were eager and reliable. No one was in our confidence, so as to know the real position, and our counsels were not divided. Gradually, in spite of all, the nucleus, consisting originally of only Dr Spence Watson, grew to a Committee containing many important names. All the while, certain people, ostensible well-wishers, kept slyly and shyly inquiring, Would we succeed? If so, they would join us. It is very miserable, but it is the fact, and ought to be stated. The Carlyle Society of London, in particular (which had been considering the question of buying the House for some years with no practical result, and which had, even after urgent entreaty and a plain statement from me that it surely ought to help, kept altogether back), having got to know that we had now the support of some good names, had the audacity to ask to join, stating that had it been earlier acquainted with the fact that we were being helped by such men, it would have joined before. To that kind of thing our only reply could be, that the cause was no better a cause than it had been at the beginning, that deferred favours were questionable benefits, and we were now indifferent. Those familiar with Johnson's castigation of Chesterfield could not have far to go for an answer, they had only to reduce the size of the men and the scale of the transaction.

Early in November a circular was drafted and submitted to all who had promised to join our Committee. It is almost painful to recall how solicitous we were that it should contain nothing but what every member was cognisant of. In later days the names were freely attached to documents that had never been submitted at all, a course unavoidable where the documents were numerous and the Committee large.

At last, on the 20th, after two months' labour, of which I have no wish to speak further, except to say that its intensity had broken Mr Miller's health down (I state this fact in conjunction with a reminder of the easy minded prosing in the article above quoted), the circular was despatched. It was sent all over the country and farther, to many hundreds of persons whose addresses we had gleaned from various sources.

The next few days were perhaps the most anxious we had yet had. Upon the success or otherwise of that circular we imagined the question finally turned, for we were nearing the end of possible expedients. Replies came in slowly, the newspapers were again rather "loud," and we felt that it was impossible to continue longer, at any rate profitably, without consulting some of our more active supporters. To meet them with a woful tale was what we were anxious to avoid above all things, for only a few were really eager, and we fearful that even they might withdraw if our statement of the position of affairs were very discouraging. But a meeting must be called, and called it accordingly was, for Wednesday, December 19, 1894, at St Martin's Free Library, St Martin's Lane, W.C. Mr Miller, having fortunately some leisure at the time, went to London a few days before the appointed date, and met two or three of our warmest supporters. His reports were only fairly favourable, the matter was critical. If the meeting were a failure, if nothing definite were done, it would mean the reconstruction of the Committee (probably an impossible undertaking), or the abandonment of the scheme. Abandon the hope of doing something we would not, indeed, we had already been considering whether at the worst we could not buy and mortgage the House, and, if need be, pay the interest out of our own pockets, whatever the exaction. But on the Monday morning preceding the meeting, we were thrown into a condition of perplexed expectancy by an announcement in the newspapers that the German Emperor had promised £100 to the Fund. I was incredulous, for, though such an act on the part of the Emperor was in itself likely enough, we had, after so many months of struggle, given up the hope of any piece of good fortune. A day later, a copy of the dispatch from Mr Poultney Bigelow, to whom it had been sent, settled the matter. It was true, and the most welcome news that could have come. The Emperor had given, effectually if unconsciously, the necessary impetus to ensure a successful meeting. Some nineteen gentlemen attended, Mr Leslie Stephen was appointed Chairman. It was my duty to explain the position, not a pleasant task even with the Emperor's £100 before us, and an almost impossible one for me then. I had drawn out an agenda paper, giving as one item the appointment of an Executive Committee. Would the gentlemen go so far? If so all else would be comparatively easy. Yes, they would proceed to organization. An Executive was appointed.—Mr Miller and Mr Reginald Blunt being Secretaries Mr B F Stevens Treasurer Solicitors, Bankers, &c. all in fact that was necessary. We were not to fail after all. The scheme had grown from the work of two men to the work of a large body that could command respect. The press vane began to veer—that is to say the press accepted a notice of the meeting without adverse comment.

The management of the movement had now practically removed to London, where all meetings, both of the General and of the Executive Committee, were held, usually at Dr Garnett's house at the British Museum. 'Begging and prying,'—as the Treasurer half humorously half sadly called it, when it became apparent that even then the effort required to buy the House would be very great,—was actively set about, the London Secretary being indefatigable in this and in other directions. Meantime Mr G W Smaller had taken advantage of a visit to New York to organize a Committee there, Mr Phillips Smaller being appointed Secretary. This Committee, as the perusal of the subscription list will now worked with great effect for the American contributions form a large percentage of the whole. A Committee formed in Glasgow by Mr George Stewart after infinite pains, was much less successful. Indeed, Scotland's apathy throughout was distressing—rather more distressing than its unquestioning and in many instances rather ignorant enthusiasm about Burns.

A suggestion made originally by the Rev W I

Dawson, and emphasized by him and one or two others at the first meeting of the Committee, namely that a public meeting should be held, was gradually worked into a practical scheme, and by the end of January, or early in February, a meeting at the Mansion House had been arranged. Meantime, could nothing be done to obtain a reduction in the price, and an extension of the option of purchase expiring at the end of February? Once the announcement of a meeting at the Mansion House was out, there could be no hope of a reduction and on the other hand we might, at the end of February, be faced with the withdrawal of the option, except upon impossible terms. So far we had only about £1,100 towards the £1,750. Even the most eager of us hardly dared to advocate the Committee's being committed definitely to the purchase. Ultimately it was decided that I should again approach the owner of the House, still before any hint of the coming Mansion House meeting had got out, and endeavour to obtain a reduction in the price, and an extension of the option. I have a very vivid recollection of the interview that followed. In order to be on neutral ground I had suggested that we should meet at a small Yorkshire town—not far from the proprietor's home—and there we accordingly met, Mr Miller accompanying me. The proprietor had come fully determined to concede nothing except time for he had evidently taken pains to inform himself that the movement had good names behind it. We did not hurry the negotiation, and after night—a most bitterly cold night—had long set in, we had still obtained nothing. At last, after all possible legitimate expedients and arguments had been tried, we came to this—Would he not put himself on a par with the German Emperor? With some qualifications. Yes, he would nominally give us a donation of £100, we conceding £25 (ultimately made £30) for loss of rent, the price to remain at £1750, and the purchase to be completed by the end of April. That was the best we could do.

On the 22nd February the meeting at the Mansion House was held. The Lord Mayor, Sir Joseph Renals, presided, the Marquis of Ripon, His Excellency Mr Bayard, and the Hon Leonard Courtney being the prominent speakers. Although the company was large, and the facilities for paying subscriptions ample, the immediate result was insignificant. The meeting was, however, widely reported, and after it we never talked of failure. But funds did not come in quickly. At the end of the month we had still only about £1,350. Mr Blunt and others continued in active canvass, and as we neared the end of April, the date on which the option expired, we found ourselves about able to pay. We had now got to the stage when the men of law must intervene, and Mr Pemberton was prompt. The fine professional "We are not anxious gentlemen" which passed between him and the Solicitors of the owner before they could actually "come to business," during which each party knew that the other was really anxious, and did mean business, occupied some little time but at length, on May 15, 1895, the property was conveyed to me, as Nominee of the Purchase Fund Committee and after an effort extending to some of us, over more than a year the old House was safe at last.

Having got the House, we had next to consider the question of repairing it. Since about September, when its unfortunate tenant with all her strange attendants had been removed, it had stood empty, and was still in the literally shocking state of filth and disrepair to which reference has already been made Under the supervision of a sub-committee and an architect, a general overhauling was immediately set about, and by the middle of July all was complete. On the 26th the House was opened to the public, without formality of any kind

Before this, and for a considerable time after, the method of vesting the property in some permanent body had been discussed Nothing satisfactory could be arrived at short of an application to the Board of Trade for a licence whereby a Trust could be formed under the Companies' Acts A Memorandum and Articles of Association, a copy of which is appended, were drawn up, the Board of Trade licence obtained, and finally, on the 29th of October, 1895, "The Carlyle's House Memorial Trust" was registered, our last serious difficulty had disappeared

With the incorporation of the Trust, the old Committee, which had been so laboriously got together, became practically obsolete, but it continued until the conveyance of the property, and the handing of it over, to the Trust Through the exertions of Mr Blunt, many interesting memorials were collected at the house with a view to opening an exhibition on December 4, the centenary of Carlyle's birth, and it was decided that on that day also the property should be handed over to the Trust In the morning the exhibition was opened, in the afternoon, at the United States Embassy, I, still acting as Nominee of the old Committee, conveyed the property to the new Trust The work of the Carlyle's House Purchase Fund Committee was done, to the very last item, and Carlyle's old Home became the property of a body which is likely to continue, and be able to protect and guard it, as long as the old brick walls will stand

ration of the Centenary, was held at the Polytechnic Institute, Chelsea when the Rev Gerald Blunt on behalf of the Purchase Fund Committee, handed the Deed over to Dr Garnett as representing the Trust—a little formal act transacted “amid applause” Alfred Miller and I had received something else than applause fifteen months before that, when struggling for the means of informing the public that Carlyle’s House was in a sad state, and for the means to save it—and we did not listen to the applauses. Speeches were delivered by gentlemen who had shown no disposition to be helpful at the moment of real need—to make speeches is easier for some men than to help a good cause. But one need not comment upon the meeting or the speeches although the soldier who has fought the hard day’s fight, and is lying down in weariness, hoping for quiet and repose may well resent the flourishing of some roistering trumpeter who having escaped the fray makes a needless and untimely din.

The perusal of the subscription list will show that support came from many lands and from as far as the Antipodes—it will show also that several who rendered us help have already ‘gone over to the great majority.’ Some were taken away while the result was still doubtful—some after it was known that we should succeed. By far the severest blow the Committee sustained was the death of Mrs. Alexander Carlyle (Marx Carlyle Aitken). At the very outset she manifested her interest in the cause by promising as already stated certain of the old furnishings—and her interest and helpfulness continued invaluable throughout. She died somewhat suddenly on May 30 last and had thus lived long enough to know that the house was safe. Those who know what she was to Carlyle during the last thirteen years of his life,—his faithful companion and amanuensis,—and know the persistent effort she made to stem the tide of calumny that swept over Carlyle's memory after the publication of the 'Reminiscences' and the "Life," will always remember her with affectionate gratitude. Carlyle's references to her (frequent in his correspondence after she came to Cheyne Row in 1868) testify in every instance to his appreciation of her, and to her devotion to what must have been a constantly trying task. After his death the task was still more trying,—the rebutting of malevolent aspersion,—and in that task, too, she unweariedly persevered. The fruits of her labour she never saw, but those who are to live when Carlyle's name shall again be honoured, will perhaps remember that his first and most strenuous vindicator was Mrs. Alexander Carlyle.

I cannot conclude this narrative without referring to some of those who were specially active in their co-operation, and whose time and energy were taxed, without recognition of any kind. It is probable that without Mr. Alfred Miller I could never have really started the movement for buying the House at all. On all occasions his advice and assistance were available. Amid uncertainties and anxieties and disappointments that made me impatient, and therefore liable to be indiscreet, he remained calm and fixed. Even when his health was affected by the strain, he persisted in sharing the work. I can never have a higher mark of friendship, and I know I can never have a better friend, whose constancy, perfect under all trials, has been an invaluable possession for many years.

In the earlier stages of the movement, doubts of all kinds, reasonable and unreasonable, were raised as to the validity of the owner's title to the House, etc.—details which were periodically disconcerting. To all my eager questions on these points, many of which must have appeared to him trivial, Mr. B. E. Pemberton answered with splendid promptitude and lucidity. Not was his advice confined to the legal aspects of the scheme. His assistance in other directions was of great importance and a real encouragement at the time when encouragement was most necessary. When the question of choosing members for the Trust arose, he declined to become a member, his place being taken by his brother, Mr. Charles S. Pemberton, who carried through the most legal work, and who has throughout been unwearied and most acceptably active in every way.

I have already referred to the excellent service rendered by Mr. G. W. Smaller in the formation of an American Committee. Mr. Smaller's services were not by any means confined to that; but were of the utmost use in securing names and subscriptions on this side of the Atlantic also. Of the work of the respective members of the American Committee, I have unfortunately no particulars. Mr. Phillips Smaller was at stated Secretary, and he and others must have spared no pains or energy in the production of such gratifying results. The exertions of Mr. George Stewart and Mr. Roxburgh, in Glasgow, were not rendered less severe by the indifference with which their cause was met by the Northern press.

From his return to the House and his being London Secretary, the name of Mr. Reginald Burdett came to be best known as a person engaged in the movement, and the public was therefore always some portion of the time and labour he spent in the cause. Apart from the unwilling to reckon for reproduction of what had been upon the walls during some portion of Carlyle's tenancy of the House. The Dining-Room grate was restored to the House through the kindness of Mr William Giles.

To the donors and the lenders of memorials generally, to all of whom an implied acknowledgment is made by the insertion of their names in the Catalogue, it will be understood that the Trust feels deeply indebted. The exhibits of Mr Robert Tait having been withdrawn, it becomes necessary to mention that he not only lent certain articles for a time, but that he rendered valuable help in the completion of the repairs to the House. To Mrs Allingham, whose exhibits fortunately still remain, acknowledgment ought also to be made in the same direction. Both she and Mr Tait very kindly placed at the disposal of the Committee their knowledge of the house and its furnishings, as they were in Carlyle's lifetime.

A glance at the Catalogue will show that a large proportion of the furnishings and other memorials have come from Mr Alexander Carlyle. After the death of his wife on May 30 last, he not only presented all the furnishings promised by her, but several other articles, and since then he has lent many memorials of the greatest interest. His advice has been in constant requisition, and, undeterred by ill health, he has contributed the account of "Carlyle's Home in Chelsea" which follows this, and also the "Chronology." To his liberality we are indebted for all the articles of furniture, and very nearly all the books, and those that consider how the house would look without them, will realize something of the extent of the indebtedness—an indebtedness which is fully recognized and acknowledged by the Trust.

Of the work of Mr J Louis Knight, I need not speak, it speaks for itself, but I may be allowed, perhaps, to bear witness to my sense of obligation to Mr Knight, not only for the illustrations themselves, but for the manner in which he undertook the task. It entailed much time and labour, and both were given most ungrudgingly, and without any regard to his own comfort or interests.

After all our exertions the sum raised was only £2,526—as exhibited in the accompanying account of the Treasurer. The sum originally asked for was much larger, inasmuch as it was thought desirable to aim at the formation of a Maintenance Fund. We have not been able to accomplish that end, desirable as it is, but there is every likelihood that the House will be self-supporting. From July 26, 1895, to April 26, 1896, the period during which the House has been open, there have been 3,800 visitors. They come from all lands, and the more hopeful amongst us maintain that the House must yet become a much frequented place of pilgrimage. Places not half so memorable or worthy have attained that distinction, and those who know the abiding quality of Carlyle's work, cannot but believe that students will be glad to see the House where he lived and wrought, through good and evil report, for nigh half a century, leaving behind him in his books a monument which will last through the ages long after the old House, which we have been so anxious to preserve has been levelled with the earth.

This is all I had to say about how Carlyle's House came to be purchased. Amongst many things wrongly and badly done one is gratified to have had a hand in a thing which is done neither topmost dome of St Paul's, other faint ghosts of spires (one other, at least) disclose themselves as the smoke cloud shifts "

In outward appearance, the Row presents no very striking feature. The houses were originally of three and a half storeys, with sunk (partly underground) kitchens and offices. They are of red brick, and their having stood so many years with little trace of decay testifies to their having been substantially built. Whilst the elements have not wrought such changes on them as might have been expected, the occupiers or owners have at various times somewhat altered the look of individual houses. In some the roofs have been heightened to give more room in the attics, to one (now No. 22) a portico and verandah have been added, and Orange House, at the end furthest from the river, once the largest and finest of the terrace, has in recent years been taken down, and an incongruous Roman Catholic church built in place of it. During Carlyle's occupancy of No. 5 (now No. 24), considerable alterations, internal as well as external, were made in 1852 and 1853, as a later portion of this account will show.

In the spring of 1834¹ Carlyle and his wife finally resolved to leave Craigenputtock, their moorland home, where they had lived for six years, and to remove to London. A friend, Mrs. Austin, then living in Bayswater, having written that what might prove a desirable house was to let in her neighbourhood, Carlyle, believing that houses in London as in Scotland changed tenants chiefly at Whitsuntide, left home rather hurriedly on the 8th of May to secure the house mentioned by Mrs. Austin, or some other, in time for the 26th of May. On his arrival, he soon discovered that Whitsuntide was not a 'term day' at all in London, and that at any rate the house suggested by Mrs. Austin would not suit.

Then began a prolonged search far and wide for a house. Bayswater, Kensington, Brompton, Chelsea, Camden Town, Regents Park and even Hampstead, were investigated. Carlyle's letters to his wife describe house after house in these localities and bear witness to his diligence in the painful search.

In one of these letters written at his lodgings 4, Ampton Street, Gray's Inn Road, on Wednesday evening the 21st of May, to his wife, then engaged in "burning the ships" (winding up affairs at Crugenyputtock) he gives his impressions of No. 5, Cheyne Row after his second visit to it. The following extracts from this letter may be inserted here as they contain an excellent description of the Row and its surroundings in 1834.

"After surveying all this¹ on Monday, I went down to Chelsea found Hunt smoked a pipe with him, and then went out again for Houses, tho with comparatively little care about them. Not a gunshot from Hunt's I came upon another house [his first view of 'No. 5'], greatly the best in quality and quantity I have yet seen. I went down again to-day. It is notable how at every new visit your opinion gets a little hitch the contrary way from its former tendency, imagination has outgone the reality. I nevertheless still feel a great liking for this excellent old House and it almost balances the Brompton one. Chelsea is unfashionable it was once the resort of the Court and great, however hence numerous old houses in it, at once cheap and excellent.

the inside of which, from our upper storeys, appear a garden surrounded with rather dim houses and questionable miscellanea, among other things clothes drying. Backwards, a Garden (the size of our back one at Comley Bank¹) with trees, &c., in bad culture, beyond this, green hayfields and tree avenues (once a Bishop's pleasure-grounds), an unpicturesque, yet rather cheerful outlook. The House itself is eminent, antique, wainscotted to the very ceiling, and has been all new-painted and repaired, broad stair, with massive balustrade (in the old style) corniced and as thick as one's thigh, floors firm as a rock, wood of them here and there worm-eaten, yet capable of cleanness, and still thrice the strength of a modern floor. And then as to room, Good, " Three storeys besides the sunk story, in every one of them three apartments in depth (something like forty feet in all, for it was thirteen of my 'steps') thus there is a front dining room (marble chimney-piece, &c.), then a back dining-room (or breakfast-room) a little narrower (by reason of the kitchen stair), then out from this a china room, or pantry, or I know not what, all shelved, and fit to hold crockery for the whole street. Such is the ground area, which of course continues to the top, and furnishes every bed room with a dressing room, or even with a second bed room. Bed Bed will stand behind the drawing room, must have the shower bath beyond it. the height of air from is 10 feet, of the ground floor 9 feet and some more of the topmost floor [i.e., the second floor] 8 feet 6 inches of the kitchen (there is a Pump and room forever) about the same. Neither this nor the Brompton house has a kitchen range but only a grate with movable niggards, &c. In Chelsea is, or lies ready for being, a kitchen jack, from the boiler house the boiler ('coppa') is taken out but 'would be replaced'. No back door (communicating with the street), bells in disorder but would be rectified, new locks, some of which threatened to get a la Puttock, but seemed very oilless. On the whole a most massive, roomy, sufficient old house, with places, for example, to hang say three dozen hats or cloaks on, and as many crevices, and queer old presses, and shelved closets (all tight and new painted in their way) as would gratify the most covetous Goody. Rent £35. I confess I am strongly tempted, yet again incline rather towards the Brompton place (for what use have we for so much room?) and so go wavering between the two. Chelsea is a singular, heterogeneous kind of spot, very dirty and confused in some places, quite beautiful in others, abounding with antiquities and the traces of great men. Sir I. More, Steele, Smollett, &c., &c. Our Row (which for the last three doors or so is a street and none of the noblest) runs out upon a beautiful 'Parade' (perhaps they call it) running along the shore of the River: shops, &c. a broad highway, with huge shady trees, boats lying moored and a smell of shipping and tar. Battersea bridge (of wood) a few yards off the broad River

Mrs Carlyle's reply (27th May) to the letter from which the above quotations are made, contains the following

"And now, my Darling, with respect to these two houses, I declare to thee they both look so attractive on paper, that I cannot tell which I ought to prefer I have great liking to that massive old concern with the broad staircase and abundant accommodation for crockery! And dressing-rooms to one's bedrooms is charming! I should not quarrel with the quantity But is it not too near the River? I should fear it would be a very foggy situation in winter, and always damp and unwholesome And the wainscot up to the ceilings,—is it painted? If in the original state hardly any number of candles (never to speak of 'only two') will suffice to light it. And another idea presents itself along with that wainscot,—if bugs have been in the house! Must they not have found there as well as the inmates 'room without end'? The other again does not attract me so much, but, to make up for that, suggests no objection, so keep them both open, if you can, till I come and if you are constrained to decide, that you may not let both slip through your hands, do it with perfect assurance that Goody will approve your choice The neighbourhood I would not let be a material point in your deliberations You have a pair of effectual legs to take you wherever you please, and for me, my chief enjoyment, I imagine, will always be in the society of my own heart's darling, and within my own four walls, as heretofore God Almighty bless you, my love. Before many days I shall see your face again

"Your own JANE."

Additional particulars in answer to the above were sent in his next letter, 30th of May, a sentence or two from which may also be given .

"I was at Chelsea and Brompton again yesterday The Chelsea house on the whole looked distinctly preferable to me yesterday (for I told you they varied from day to day) The wainscot is painted a light colour, almost white (colour of our drawing-room doors), the two dining-rooms (beautiful rooms) new-papered above the wainscot! He [the landlord] will introduce a right kitchen grate (with boiler, &c) on fair terms, on the whole a reasonable speaking man The Brompton house looked dreadfully little, I was also hurt to discover that the room I intended for our poor red bed had been used as an adjunct to the kitchen, and had bell not going from but entering into and hanging in it! Figure a guest laid there to sleep I have seen many, many other houses, but these two continue far the best The only ones I shall trouble you with looking at, besides the two, are one in Kensington and one in Bayswater "

Mrs Carlyle joined her husband in London on the 4th of June Together they viewed the houses which he had selected, and many others besides, spending some three days "dashing up and down in all manner of conveyances, where such were to be had cheap, and walking where not" The Chelsea house did not exactly please Mrs Carlyle at first, but after comparison with other specimens it was ultimately found to be "nearly twice as good as any other we could get for the money "

So on Saturday, the 7th of June, they "finally fixed" on No 5 The house was taken on yearly Agreement "for one year certain" from the 24th of June, with option of continuing as yearly tenants or of leaving on giving six months' notice The landlord's name was "William Morgan, of Pope's Head Alley," the rent was £35 This Agreement continued in force until 1852, when it was superseded by a "repairing lease" to run for thirty-one years, the rent to remain the same, though the ownership of the house had changed hands There is annexed to the Agreement (of 1834) a list of fixtures, curiously minute, enumerating "bell-wires and cranks," "locks and keys," "stoves and ranges," "a 23 inch Copper," and in the yard "a large water-butt, with large brass cock, and stand," &c The tenant agreed to pay for a new range for the front kitchen and the cost of setting it, and the landlord to refund to him £7 3s "therefor at any time the said Thomas Carlyle shall quit the said premises"

TAKING POSSESSION OF THE HOUSE.

On Tuesday, the 10th of June, the Carlyles left their lodgings, 4, Ampton Street, Gray's Inn Road (the house of the Mileses, where they had been staying during the search for a house, and where, also, they had passed the winter of 1831-2), and with their mudservant, Bessy Barnet,¹ proceeded by coach to Chelsea to enter into possession of No 5, Cheyne Row. Carlyle gives in the "Jane Welsh Carlyle," written immediately after his wife's death in 1866, the following account of the journey, and of the kind of life passed during the first few days in their new home.

"We proceeded all through Belgrave Square hither, with our Servant, our looser luggage, ourselves and a little canary bird ('Chico,' which she² had brought with her from Crugenputtock) one hackney coach rumbling on with us all. Chico, in Belgrave Square, burst into singing, which we took as a good omen. We were all of us striving to be cheerful (she needed no effort of striving) but we 'had burnt our ships,' and at bottom the case was grave. I don't remember our arriving at this door, but I do the cheerful Gypsy life we had here among the litter and carpenters, for three incipient days. Leigh Hunt was in the next street, sending kind unpractical messages. In the evenings, I think, personally coming in, we had made acquaintance with him

(properly he with us) just before leaving [London] in Spring, 1832."

"And here we spent our two and thirty years of hard battle against Fate—hard but not quite unvictorious, when she left me as in her car of heaven's fire."

He says further, in a note which he appended to one of his wife's letters on reading them through in 1868

"The business of sorting and settling with two or three good carpenters already on the ground, was at once gone into with boundless alacrity and under such management as hers went on at a mighty rate. In about a week, it seems to me, all was swept and garnished, fairly habitable, and continued incessantly to get itself polished, civilized and beautiful to a degree that surprised me."

On 27th June he wrote to his brother Alck. giving, amongst other things, a most interesting account (hitherto unpublished) of the arrangement of the furniture, the occupation of the rooms, &c., and general impressions of their new home.

"The house here continues to satisfy us amazingly—it is spacious, well aired, quiet, clean, every way sufficient. The two under rooms (which by folding doors are one) have got the old Puttock drawing-room carpet on them, with certain strips of dyed blankets most judiciously fitted in to help—and now with their two windows looking out into the quiet street where little but green leaves and branches is visible, and their one window into the garden and clean flagged court,—form, with their strong old fashioned Scotch furniture, really one of the agreeablest apartments I ever sat in unfashionable in the highest degree, but in the highest degree comfortable and serviceable. The green drawing room curtains are there, a pair of green Venetian blinds are to be there very soon, for the two front windows. 'The Piano,'¹ just about getting tuned, is in the front room, with the round drawing room table, and chairs and etceteras enough. the little clock² is on his bracket in the back room, with the dining room oval table. It is here where we sit in dewy morning sunshine, and breakfast on hot coffee and the best of bread and butter.

"I myself am upstairs (as now) in the front room at my old writing table,"³ with one of the dining-room chairs for personal use, and some eight other ornamental London ones of cherry wood and cane bottoms, bought for some eight-and-six apiece, really very handsome. I bought a large second-hand press for my Books, fully larger than the Scotsbrig one, now our Mother's, and all of the best workmanship and beautifullest dark 'Onjuras mayugany' (Honduras mahogany) for £4 a most sturdy sufficient thing And now in this and in two other strange wall presses (with which the old house abounds), all my Books are safe stored, and the red carpet and red curtains being fitted in, and everything as dry as a bone,—I sit quite snug, and 'far better than I deserve' We also find Chelsea exceedingly convenient for shops and the like, which is a thing nowise universal in the other suburbs "

Mrs Carlyle also seemed equally well pleased with their bargain She writes shortly after the settlement in Cheyne Row

"Well! is it not strange that I am here, sitting in my own hired house by the side of the Thames, as if nothing had happened, with fragments of Haddington, of Comley Bank, of Craigenputtock interwaved with Cockneycalities into a very habitable whole? We have got an excellent lodgement, of most antique physiognomy, quite to our humour all wainscotted, carved and queer-looking, roomy, substantial, commodious, with closets to satisfy any Bluebeard Two weeks ago there was a row of ancient trees in front, but some crazy-headed Cockneys have up-rooted them Behind we have a garden (so called in the language of flattery) in the worst of order, but boasting of two vines which produced two bunches of grapes in the season, which 'might be eaten,' and a walnut tree, from which I gathered almost sixpence worth of Walnuts "

OF THE ROOMS NOW OCCUPIED AND FURNISHED
about 1850

Front Dining Room - On entering the house from the street, the first door to the left leads into this room. It was used up till 1853 as the drawing room, and is frequently spoken of as the "parlour". It has two windows overlooking the street, and folding doors lying between it and the room behind. At first it was furnished with the Crugernputtock drawing-room furniture: in the centre stood the eight-legged round table used as the dining table in 1790 years, and now (1899) forming part of the property of the Trust (see No. 8 in Catalogue). It is really a double table, each half with semicircular top on four legs, may be used alone as a side table, or the two may be clamped together to form a round table of about four feet in diameter. A piano stood in the recess to the left of the fireplace, and a small three-shelved bookcase to the right, and along the opposite wall stood a couch. The chairs had originally formed part of the dining-room suite of Dr. Welsh of Haddington (Mrs. Carlyle's father). There were twelve of them (two having arms), substantial, well-proportioned mahogany chairs covered in horsehair. It is of them that Carlyle writes in the "Reminiscences": "Repeatedly have upholsterers asked 'Who made these chairs m'am?' In Cockneydom nobody in our day unexampled prosperity makes another kind." They were made, it may further be remarked, by an Edinburgh firm over a hundred years ago, and have ever since been in daily use. Carlyle always used one of the armchairs as his writing chair, and two of the set (one ordinary, one arm) now form part of the property of the Trust (see Nos. 9 and 115 in Catalogue). The windows had new green Venetian blinds, and the green curtains brought from Craigenputtock, and, many years afterwards, cane blinds in addition. The Craigenputtock drawing-room carpet, supplemented by a border, served to cover the floors both of this room and the room behind it. On the newly-papered walls hung the best of the Craigenputtock pictures.¹ Mrs Carlyle, writing on 5th September, 1836 (on her return from a visit to Scotland), says "My best room looked really inviting. A bust of Shelley (a present from Leigh Hunt), and a fine print of Albert Durer's (also a present)² had still further ornamented it in my absence."

It was into this room that Edward Irving was ushered when he paid his one visit to Cheyne Row, in Autumn, 1834. "I recollect how he complimented her (as he well might) on the pretty little room she had made for her husband and self, and running his eye over her dainty bits of arrangement, ornamentations, all so frugal, simple, full of grace, propriety and ingenuity as they ever were, said, smiling, 'You are like an Eve, and make a little Paradise wherever you are.'"³

When Mrs Carlyle's mother died (25th February, 1842), a large quantity of furniture, pictures, &c., was brought up from her home (Templand), and some of it placed in this room. The piano mentioned above was disposed of, and Mrs Welsh's one substituted, but this was at a later period removed to the drawing room upstairs. In 1858 the large bookcase⁴ was brought down from the room above, which had been converted into the drawing room in 1853, and placed against the south wall, closing up the door into the passage. And later still, in open bookshelves of the same height as the fireplace, was placed in the room to the right of the fireplace, and in the recess to the left (next the window) stood a composite piece of furniture in three separate parts: (1) a two-bayed open bookcase, (2) on the middle bay a secretaire which Carlyle used mainly for his business papers, and on which he wrote the greater part of the "Reminiscences"; and (3) above the secretaire were placed open bookshelves reaching to the cornice. A narrow row of bookshelves extending from the chimney to the cornice, was fixed between the windows. When the study was dismantled on the completion of "Friedrich" in 1865, a set of pedestal drawers, and a little mahogany table (inlaid with white holly), having a drawer, sliding base, and slender turned legs, were brought down hither. In later years, also, a large mirror in gilt frame (presented by Lord Ashburton) stood above the mantel, and on the shelf a beautiful pair of candlesticks of ivory and ebony, which Mr. Anthony Sterling had himself made and presented to Mrs. Carlyle. About 1850, the massive steel grate, now restored, was substituted for the common register of earlier years.

⁴ This bookcase has cupboards beneath, enclosed by four panelled doors, it now stands in its original place in the

Carlyle frequently wrote in this room, and the last of the many house-cleanings and repairs ("domestic earthquakes") superintended by Mrs. Carlyle was the reprinting, repapering, and fitting of it up in 1865 as his future study.

Mention should also be made of the famous screen, which sometimes stood in this room at the end of the sideboard next the door, and sometimes in the drawing-room. It is an ordinary four-fold screen about four feet high, on every part of which Mrs Carlyle had pasted, "with her own hands," prints, engravings, portraits of men, women, horses, dogs, &c, arranged in a very artistic way. It was specifically bequeathed by the codicil to Carlyle's Will in the following words: "I give and bequeath the Screen which stands in the Drawing-room to my dear Niece, Mary Carlyle Aitken, who best knows the value I have always put upon it, and will best take care of it to the end of her life when I am gone She knows by whom it was made, and I wish her to accept it as a testimony of the trust I repose in her, and as a mark of my esteem for her honourable, veracious and faithful character, and a memorial of all the kind and ever faithful service she has done me "

The China Closet.—This little apartment, "fitted with shelves all round," as stated in the schedule of fixtures (Agreement of 1834), was altered in 1843, and furnished as part of the back dining-room, the shelves being removed and a window opened out in the south wall A little black table with bow shaped legs ("claw-and-ball" feet) was placed along the east wall, facing the door, and upon it stood a beautiful bright steel box, presented by Anthony Sterling on his return from the Crimea The box is made of cedar wood covered with very thin steel plates stamped into patterns The north-west corner was occupied by a cupboard, and the north wall afforded space for the three-shelved, dwarf bookcase brought hither in late years from the front dining-room

Beneath the table generally stood the little arm-chair (Jane Welsh's when a child) which had been brought to Cheyne Row amongst the other Temp-land furnishings

It is thus referred to in Carlyle's Will "To her [his niece, Miss M C Aitken] I give the little child's chair (in the China closet) which to my eyes has always a brightness as of lime's morning and a sadness as of Death and Eternity when I look on it, and which I have the weak wish to preserve in loving hands yet awhile when I am gone," and in a letter to his wife, dated 25th April, 1842, he says of it

 "The wee chair!" It was like to make me weep as it stood yonder at Templeland, and so much had come and gone since it was occupied!

First Floor

Ascending the stairs with their spirally-turned balusters and heavy hand-rail, the visitor will find, on reaching the landing, two doors, one in front, one to the right, the former leads into the "library" (in later years the drawing-room), the latter into a bedroom, off which is a dressing-room corresponding in size and position to the china closet on the ground floor

The Library or Drawing-room — This room was originally of the same width as the parlour beneath it, but longer than that room (from north to south) by the width of the hall or passage

Prior to 1852, when it was considerably altered and enlarged, the fireplace and chimney-breast extended some four feet into the room, in the recesses to the right and left were "queer old presses," in the latter of which was a narrow window looking out on to the street. These "presses" extended to the ceiling, and were in fact little rooms, and it has been said that the one with the window was intended for a "powdering room." The three large windows (overlooking the street) were smaller, and higher from the floor than they now are, and the room itself three feet narrower

The chief articles of furniture were Carlyle's writing table,¹ one of the dining-room armchairs for his own use, eight new cane bottomed chairs, the oval centre table now in its old place (see No 36 in Catalogue), the large mahogany bookcase (a London purchase), also in its old place, as pre-

At night there stood on the centre table a candle lamp, to which Carlyle thus refers in a letter to his mother, 12th September, 1834 "Lastly, we have got a most beautiful lamp of the sinumbra kind, and sit by it nightly over our needlework and papers, really most beautifully illuminated, at no great cost. It is a device of Jane's, who loves light passionately,—a most innocent passion." This sinumbra (shadowless) lamp was constructed to hold and burn a large candle always being raised by a spring as it was consumed. The lamp is now again in the House, but, most unluckily, the shade was broken when being brought from Ecclefechan on its presentation to the Trust (see No. 14 in Catalogue).

A very large secondhand sofa of beech, with the front and arms carved and stained, was bought by Mrs Carlyle in October, 1835. She says of it in writing to her husband, "I came, saw, and bought—a sofa!" so soon as you set eyes on it and behold its vastness, its simple greatness, you will perceive that the thought of you was actively at work in my choice." It stood in the north-west corner of the room with its back to the outer wall. For the rest, the room was then furnished as a literary workshop, simply and appropriately; it was not used as a reception room, except perhaps for the most intimate friends, and then chiefly in the evening.

After the death of Mrs Welsh, the drawing-room chairs from Templand took the place of the cane chairs, which were distributed amongst the bedrooms. Of the former, twelve in number, two have been presented to the Trust, and are now in the room (see No. 35 in Catalogue). They are made of English elm, in the style called Chippendale, and are large and substantial, but perhaps too heavy-looking to be called elegant. Almost the only decoration attempted is a hand-carved "Prince of Wales' Feather" at the top of each of the three inner bars of the back.

In the house cleaning and repairing of 1843, some considerable alterations, if not improvements, were made in this room: the library door was "turned" (i.e., made to open the opposite way—changed from a "left hand" to a "right hand" door), the closet or press to the left of the fireplace was removed and a movable bookcase substituted, and the other press altered, how is not said. The walls where the press had been were battened out, the cornice and skirting continued round the room, and two more bookcases were fixed, the beautiful wainscot was hidden under canvas and paper, and the other woodwork all painted and varnished.

So the library continued until the year 1852, when the oft-renewed speculation of quitting London and retiring to the country was settled in the negative. The Carlyles decided to take a long lease of the house, and to alter and repair it to their taste. Specifications and estimates were procured, and in consideration of the permanent improvement to be effected to the property by the carrying out of these, and of the unusual length of the lease (a "repairing" one, too), the rent was not raised, although no doubt the rental value had somewhat increased since 1834. The term of the lease was thirty-one years from 24th June, 1852, and the "parties thereto, Alfred Oldridge and Thomas Carlyle."

The specifications and builder's receipts are still extant, and show that the "repairs" on this occasion were both extensive and expensive. The chief work was on the library "an enlargement of it into a kind of Drawing-room according to modern ideas," Carlyle says, but many other improvements were made: water was laid on from the waterworks (one cistern being placed on the upper half-landing, another in the kitchen),¹ gas was also introduced, although only to the lamp above the front door, and a new kitchen range was fixed, with water supply to its boiler. The alterations, which it was promised would take but six weeks from the 5th July, 1852, were through mismanagement not actually completed for about a year.

The enlargement of the library was effected in two ways. By moving its east wall outwards, an additional width of three feet—at the expense, of course, of the bedroom behind it and of the landing—was obtained, and secondly, by cutting back the huge protruding fireplace and chimney breast (a process which had to be repeated in the room directly above) and clearing the recesses to the right and left, two or three feet were gained in length. A new floor was laid here, as also in the two bedrooms on the second floor. A Bramah grate was set in the fireplace, similar to the one in the front parlour (but with small blue coloured Dutch tiles, instead of the large white and brown ones) The narrow window mentioned above was bricked up, the three large windows of the room were lengthened by cutting down the brickwork beneath them, new sashes with thin bars took the place of the heavy old-fashioned ones, and afforded a great increase of light, although the lower sashes were glazed with ground (or obscured) glass. New shutters and new Venetian outside blinds were added, and a double door was made in the new wall into the bedroom behind. Two new book-cases, with cupboards under, enclosed by panelled doors, were built in the recesses to the right and left of the fireplace¹ New papering, painting, and varnishing, the total cost being nearly £400, completed the work by the end of June, 1853

Thus remodelled, the room continued to be used as Carlyle's study Writing to his brother Alick, 8th April, 1853, he says "I believe this [the repairs, &c., of 1852 and 1853] has cost more than twice as much money, and perhaps five times as much time and bother as you, had you been here on the spot, would have brought us through for I have, tho' unpapered and unpainted as yet, an excellent, large, wholesome room to sit in 19 feet by 18 or more" And to Dr Carlyle, on 27th June following "I am banished hither [to the front bedroom, second floor] for a week past by the painter people, who I hope are departing forevermore"

They did at last depart, but only to be soon called in again The "excellent, large, wholesome room" was found intolerable from noise The street noises had been gradually increasing with the increase of population in the once quiet suburb, and with the failure of the improved library, a "sound-proof" room at the top of the house, which had long been talked of, was at length decided on It was completed early in 1854, as will be explained later, and Carlyle having taken possession of it, the library became and remained the drawing-room—a room of which Mrs Carlyle was justly proud She quotes her neighbour as saying, "with a look of envy," "You couldn't have got a house with such a room in it under £150 a year" A good deal of furniture, especially of the ornamental sort, was added to what has already been mentioned Two pier-glasses, reaching from the skirting board to the cornice, were fixed between the windows, and a large mirror over the mantelshelf. In 1858 a copy of Pesne's portrait of Friedrich and Wilhelmina was presented by Lord Ashburton,¹ and was hung on the south wall, the large bookcase being removed to the front dining-room,

as above stated, to make room for it. Other pictures worthy of special mention here, are Pesne's

portrait of Wilhelmina ("with the fontange on her brow"), Faithorne's print of Cromwell between the Pillars, Friedrich the Silent (an Albert Dürer engraving, presented by Mr Ruskin), Melancholia (Albert Dürer), and two most lifelike portraits of Carlyle by Mrs Allingham

An easy chair, given to Mrs Carlyle in, or a little before, 1847, by Henry Taylor (afterwards Sir Henry), was placed in this room, and a very large high backed easy chair, covered in green morocco, with movable reading desk swinging on a brass arm, presented about 1875 to Carlyle by John Forster, also found room here. The cottage piano was brought up from the dining-room, and placed in front of the right-hand bookcase, with its back to the new partition wall. Of the many ornaments, the following may be mentioned as more or less typical. Two handsome gold-plated candlesticks (to hold three candles each), and a beautiful carriage clock (a present from Lord Ashburton), with various ornamental china vases, stood on the mantelshelf, and on the centre table two paperweights, one a little elephant in marble, the other (by Dickens) a green lacquered bronze representing a boy swinging on a gate, his straw hat hung on the post, his books thrown carelessly on the ground, and on the base of the pedestal the legend, "Au Diable des Leçons." The oval table from the back dining room had been brought up here and placed by the south wall just under the portrait of Friedrich and Wilhelmina and on it stood a little leather envelope cabinet and, amongst other things, a brass bound bone box, believed to have been Swift's money box and a silver statuette of Marie Antoinette (Lord R. Gower).

The room was redecorated several times after it became the drawing room the last time in 1874, under the supervision of Miss Mary Carlyle Aitken, the niece before referred to. New wall-paper (clusters of small leaves on a light green ground, similar to that now on the walls) took the place of the large patterned white and pink paper of previous years. The red curtains were dyed a pretty brown, the red covering of the sofa, and the white chintz of the chairs, gave place to a delicate olive green serge. New table covers of a small neat pattern in harmonious colours, and new striped blinds, were also features of a decoration which at the time received much discriminative admiration.

The Back Bedroom — This, with its dressing-room, was probably used as the spare, or guest's bedroom, in the early years. Afterwards it became Mrs Carlyle's own bedroom, though she occasionally slept in the front room upstairs until 1852. Not much is known of how it was furnished originally, or even during Mrs Carlyle's occupancy. The "red bed," a medium size four-poster, was set up in this room when the Carlyles took possession of the house. In her letters Mrs Carlyle often refers to it as her "own red bed," "that bed I was born in," etc. In 1842, when the Best bed¹ was brought up from Templand, it took the place of the red bed, which was then removed to a front bedroom on the second floor. In 1852, when the back bedroom was made smaller (by the widening of the drawing-room) the Best bed was found to be too large for the contracted space. It was set up in the front bedroom upstairs, and the red bed brought down again, where it remained until about 1870, when it was taken down and packed away in the study. It was again put up in its old place on the 18th of November, 1880, for the use of Carlyle

Second Floor

Front Bedroom—This, the largest and handsomest bedroom in the house, was originally two rooms. The two doors which led into them from the landing are both still visible, the left one long since closed up. Where exactly the partition stood is not now known, but it probably divided the room into a larger and a smaller room, the former with two windows, the latter with one. In the larger room the red bed was put up in 1842, as has been already stated. The following year, Carlyle, finding the library too noisy, decided to make a study of his dressing-room, whilst Mrs. Carlyle decided to remove the partition and make the two front rooms into one large bedroom for herself. It is to these alterations that Mrs. Carlyle refers when she writes in October, 1843, "Down went a partition in one room, up went a chimney in another." The chimney was in Carlyle's dressing room, as will be seen. When the rooms were made into one, the "red bed" was placed with its head to the south wall, and Mrs. Carlyle often slept here until 1852. And in that year she appears to have decided to make it exclusively and permanently her sleeping chamber, for Carlyle says, in a letter to Dr. Carlyle, on July 8th, "There will remain always behind the Drawing-room a guest's bedroom, tho' contracted in size, where we hope to see you one day, our first guest in it, if we are in luck." But Mrs. Carlyle found, on further trial, that the front room was too noisy, and she soon removed to the Back bedroom on the first floor, where she continued till the end. The front room then became the "spare" bedroom. In 1852 it was, as has already been observed, enlarged by cutting back the fireplace, but the prettily-carved chimney-piece was preserved, as well as the old cupboards on each side of the fireplace.

Carlyle's Bedroom — This room, behind the one just referred to, was Mr and Mrs Carlyle's bedroom for the first few years of their life at Cheyne Row. The vainscot of this room was never canvassed as in the case of the others, it was painted in party colours in 1852. In later years the panels were papered, and the styles painted.

As to furniture, there was the old four poster (now presented to the Trust, see No 67 in Catalogue) which Carlyle bought in Dumfries in 1828 (30th August to be precise) for £6 5s, "part of the payment for the Article on Jean Paul." The foot-posts and cornice are of mahogany, the rest (covered by the drapery), of Scotch fir. A few years ago the bed, after having been removed from the house, was made nine inches narrower, and the posts lowered in proportion. The casters are new, and of a much larger size than the old ones, which were worn out. This was not a "red bed," but a green one, although in later years Mrs Carlyle supplied new curtains, etc., of her favourite red colour, and they are the ones now on the bedstead. The large press or hanging wardrobe which fills the recess to the left of the fireplace was built there in 1852. To the right of the fireplace there stood an old-fashioned secretaire (writing desk with drawers and pigeon hole) which was brought up from Temple and in 1842

again to the south

wall stood his chest of drawers (where it now is, see No. 69 in Catalogue) by his bedside a little round table, for candle, pipe,¹ etc., and at the foot of the bed a couch or small sofa. A dressing table and two little looking glasses, and two or three cane bottomed chairs, complete the list of furniture.

A list of the pictures is given elsewhere (pp. 101, et seq.), but one or two of special interest may be noted here. A large (three quarter life size) portrait in oil of his Mother, painted by Maxwell of Dumfries in 1842, hung over the fire place, and on the mantelshelf stood the pretty miniature of Miss Welsh (by Macleay, 1826), in a frame along with two photographs of her (as Mrs. Carlyle), one by Mr. Tait and the other by Mr. Parsons. And here also lay the little bible (in two volumes) which his mother had given him on his leaving home for college.

Carlyle's Dressing room — In 1843 a window was opened out and a fireplace made in this room, ¹ Carlyle preferred and generally used a long clay pipe, but never smoked when writing, seldom when reading, and was in fact a much more moderate smoker than is commonly supposed.

the uncertainty of their tenure of the house had hitherto prevented the Carlyles from doing more than talk of it. But in 1853 the annoyance from the pianos, dogs, parrots, "demon fowls," etc., of their neighbours became "intolerable," and a long lease having, as already stated, been secured the year before, the enterprise was set about practically

Carlyle writes to his sister, Mrs Aitken, on the 11th of August, 1853 "All summer I have been more or less annoyed with noises, even accidental ones, which get free access through my open windows all the tinkering and 'repairing' has done me no good in that respect At length, after deep deliberation, I have fairly decided to have a top story put upon the house, one big apartment, 20 feet square, with thin double walls, light from the top, &c, and artfully ventilated,—into which no sound can come, and all the cocks in nature may crow round it, without my hearing a whisper of them! John Chorley, a practical Liverpool railway man, who is very loyal to me, went to Cubitt's, the chief Builders here, and told them my sad case, 'a literary man,' &c., and they agreed to send a 'right man' with estimates, &c., &c., and here accordingly he is this very day mounting his scaffolds and ladders from the street, to work altogether from the outside, and to have done within 'six weeks' "

The following, excerpted from the specifications, will give some notion of this erection on the roof

"To take off the present roof and build a new room, put on a new curb roof with a proper skylight made to open, and of suitable dimensions for the size of the room Prepare and put up a pair of horizontal glazed sashes to run easily on brass rollers under the skylight, forming an air chamber between The roof to be boarded and covered with best Bangor slate Form an air chamber between slating and the whole surface of the room And the lower part [i.e., the east and west sides of the room, where the roof would be lower] to be brought perpendicular, forming an air chamber as well as closets at the back and front with double doors also small double windows to light the closets and ventilate if required Build up each chimney stack and parting wall, a fireplace and air flues with proper ventilators on the side opposite the fireplace [and two on the side of the stove, added by John Chorley] six ventilators in the skirting back and front, supplied with external air by perforated iron bricks fixed under the cornice. Build up the brick and front walls of sufficient height, and run a cornice to match that of the next house and on the same level, and with a parapet. Plaster the room inside the air chamber as well as the outside. Fix moulded skirting and architraves to the doors, and a double door to the entrance to the room. Continue the staircase to the room of the same width as the lower stair. Remove the cistern to the top of the house. Fix a sink on the landing on the place where it [the cistern] now is. Put in a suitable window [as large as the space will allow, added by Chorley] on the landing, to open with lines and weights in the usual way. Put in a good floor of 7/8 in yellow pine. Paint all the woodwork in the room, paper the room with good paper as may be chosen [by Mr Carlyle, added by Chorley]. Put in a stove as may be chosen, also fix a veined Italian marble chimney piece with 12 inch shelf. The whole work to be done to the satisfaction of Mr Chorley or anyone he may appoint. [The Builder also to fix a suitable bell with handle in the room, added by Chorley.] The whole to be done for the sum of £169."

The scheme looked promising on paper, but in result it proved largely a failure. The workmanship was bad, the ventilators were quite inadequate, the skylight had to be kept open, at least in warm weather, and noises, and "blacks" from the neighbouring chimneys found ready entrance. The work was delayed, too, by a strike, in consequence of which inferior men were engaged.

It was not until the 2nd of October that Carlyle could say "On Monday last, and never till then, I got fairly in and saw my 'new room' (for they have done it all from the outside till the very last), a spacious kind of place and very light but sadly disappointing in one respect—it is of irregular shape in two of the walls, and in part two feet lower than I expected! But it now clearly seems the 'Surveyor' with his 'Building Act' stood in the way—if it be soundproof, as the Chorley prediction confidently runs, certainly it will be a grand relief to me

Would I were at my work again, in it, or in any cell or safe inverted tub " And ten days later "So I shall not get into my room this winter in fact, I do not much mind, for the noises, at any rate, have now much faded away the Drawing-room (a really excellent apartment, due to Jane and the toils of last year), where all my Books are, is a much better lodging till the cold weather go "

Carlyle, who possessed considerable mechanical skill, and knew when work was well done, had noticed the bad workmanship, and long before he had practically made trial of the room, more than doubted its "soundproof" quality He wrote to Dr Carlyle on 28th November "By Christmas, the undertaking is, they shall have finished, and be fairly gone, all but the paperhangers in Spring for one day If I could expect to be quiet then —But alas, I fear my room is irremediably somewhat of a failure, and that 'quiet' is far off me yet!"

The new study, with extras (one of these being "a large deal cupboard fitted with shelves and folding doors," still standing in the north-east corner of the room), cost just under £200 Carlyle moved into it in the Spring of 1854, and, after various little improvements had been made—a new grate that would warm the room, for one thing,—he found it "supportable," at least He said that, although the noises in the immediate neighbourhood were excluded, other sounds in the distance, railway whistles, bells, and the like, "evils that he knew not of" in the lower rooms, became in this way painfully audible Nevertheless, he continued to occupy it as his study until "Friedrich" was finished in 1865

As to the furnishings his writing table and arm-chair (one of the dining room chairs previously mentioned) stood in the middle of the floor and, within reach, the little mahogany table already referred to on page 43 for books, &c , a chest of pedestal drawers stood on the left of the fireplace (which is in the middle of the north wall), and in the north-west corner, a high open bookcase of eight shelves (the back of it to the closet wall), and in the opposite corner, with its back to the landing, another set of three long bookshelves, the lowest compartment in each of these bookcases being wide enough to admit folios. There was still another bookcase, much larger than either of these, in the south-west corner of the room. All the books in these related to Frederick and his times. "Voltaire" (in 97 volumes, now restored) filled a shelf and a half of the long three-tiered bookcase. Along the south wall was a sofa, with movable mattress and pillow covered in horsehair. Against the east wall (to the left of the door into the closet) stood one of the halves of the octopede round table above described (p. 41), the large deal press built in that corner, with its back to the north wall, held the maps, prints, papers, &c , which were only occasionally used. There was also a large fourfold screen, covered with portraits of Frederick, his generals, and many other characters which figure in the "History of Friedrich." The walls, too, were covered with maps, prints, and other illustrations, relating mainly to the subject in hand. There were, besides, photographs of members of Carlyle's family, and a little hand-made map of Brantford Township, Canada, showing the exact position of his brother Alick's farm, &c. On the mantelshelf there were two china candlesticks, and a bronze statuette of Napoleon. The closet to the west side contained the large cistern which, owing to a bad ball-tap, was in the habit of "overflowing." The other closet was used as a lumber-room generally, and could be entered direct from the stairs by a door of its own, as well as from the study

When "Friedrich" was at last finished, in 1865, the furniture was all taken to the dining-room, except two of the large bookcases, which remained till 1882, and the writing-table. The latter was removed to the drawing-room. In later years it stood with its back to the double door, which was covered with a portière curtain, and seldom used after Mrs Carlyle's death. The study then became the servants' bedroom.

The books which Carlyle had used in writing "Friedrich" (and "Cromwell") were bequeathed to Harvard University. An excellent catalogue of them, giving Carlyle's marginal annotations, &c., was prepared and printed by the Harvard authorities, a copy of this is now in the study.

The Basement—Excepting the coal cellar, this corresponded exactly in area and plan with the first floor, before the latter was altered in 1852, in the way already described. The kitchen, with its two windows looking into the area (then only half sunk), was in front, behind was the back kitchen, or wash house, with copper in the north-east corner, and small open range in the middle of the north wall, in the rear of this again (under the china closet of the ground-floor and the dressing rooms of the upper storeys) was the larder, and to the south of it, entered by a doorway from the wash house, was the coal cellar, a spacious apartment with shoot in the garden area.

A new range was put into the kitchen when the Carlyles entered into possession of the house in 1834, and again a new one in 1852, with "self-supplying boiler." Although water (from the water-works) was laid on in 1852, the water from the well (with its pump in the south west corner) continued to be used long after that date, as appears from a letter of Mrs Carlyle's of November, 1864, in which she blames one of her servants for "a pump-well gone irrecoverably dry" The wooden lining (dado) was put up in 1852, and gas was laid on from the meter in 1877 The old dresser, there in 1834, still stands against the south wall, as also the sink in the corner beside the pump The old kitchen table (in late years made a foot or so shorter) has been given to the Trust, and now stands in its former place the middle of the floor (p. No. 100 in Catalogue)

The Garden — Of the garden, so called in the language of flattery, Carlyle writes (to his mother) 12th June, 1834 "It is of admirable comfort to me in the summer sun. I am winder about in dressing gown and straw hat in it, is of old and take my pipe in pace. He frequently sat and read here and in very hot weather he sometimes wrote at a little table and writing desk placed near the water butt, under an awning or in a shady corner of the flinged court. There was also a tent umbrella put up at times, and Mrs. Carlyle describes an extemporized awning made by herself of tablecloth and clothes poles. Carlyle kept the garden very neat and trim 'with his own hands.' Soon after taking possession of the house he purchased a set of tools and did his gardening himself. In 1840 he says to his brother Alex. "I have always forgotten to tell you what good I have got of the axe and sickle you sent me long since.

The sickle hangs on a branch of our old scrag of a cherry tree (which grows large quantities of cherries, mostly eaten by sparrows). I mow the grass with it, hew down the superfluous vine-branches, and may a time thank poor Alex's brotherliness. Besides the cherry tree and grape vine there was a walnut tree (from which Mrs. Carlyle gathered nearly sixpence worth of walnuts), lilac bushes, plum tree blossom, jessamine, willflowers, and mint in abundance. There was also a copper beech near the dustbin (in the north east corner) and in July 1837 Carlyle writes "I have bought three fruit trees and put them into this poor sooty patch of garden the old ones the work of some good man 150 years ago having died or needed to be torn out one pear and one cherry, for this year, seem to be all our promise of fruit harvest, but some poor hungry Cockney in another generation may do better" In 1875, or so, Carlyle himself planted a little plane tree, which, after many transplantings, is now growing in an Edinburgh garden. The dwarf wall and pillars, which divide the garden from the flagged court, were built in 1852. The walk ran due east for six or eight feet from between the centre pillars, and then turned to the left at right angles, then to the right, and continued, at a distance of about three feet from the north wall to the top of the garden. The walk had edging tiles along the side nearest the wall, and a flower border stretched between the wall and tiles. The walk was altered by a later tenant, but has now been restored to nearly its original position.

Two china garden-seats (called by Mrs Carlyle "noblemen's seats") were placed in the garden in summer. One of these has been presented to the Trust (see No 161 in Catalogue), but Carlyle generally used one of the kitchen chairs as his garden-seat.

Mrs Carlyle's little dog Nero, having been run over by a butcher's cart in January, 1860, was put out of pain by Dr Barnes, and buried some five feet from the south east corner of the garden. The headstone which originally marked the grave has unfortunately been removed.

OF THE

1 The name of the Association is "THE CARLYLE'S HOUSE MEMORIAL TRUST". It is hereinafter referred to as "The Trust".

2 The registered office of the Trust will be situate in England.

3 The objects for which the Trust is established are:—

- (a) The acquisition of the freehold and inheritance of a certain house and premises situate in Chelsea, in the County of London, and known as No. 21, Cheyne Row, and also of such articles and things associated with the memory of Thomas Carlyle or his wife as shall be hereafter accumulated and placed therein.
- (b) The preservation and maintenance of the said house and premises as a public memorial of the said Thomas Carlyle, who resided there from the year 1831 continuously until his death, which occurred there on the 5th day of February 1881.
- (c) The acquisition of any other messuages, lands, and hereditaments of any Manor or of any other property within the United Kingdom associated with the memory of the said Thomas Carlyle or his wife.
- (d) To make charges (of such moderate amount as may in the judgment of the Trust be necessary for the due preservation and maintenance of the property of the Trust) for admission to the said house and premises.
- (e) To accept gift or bequests of and to hold any other property (including money) on trusts connected with the objects of the Trust and to fulfil such trusts.
- (f) To accept subscriptions and donations and apply the same either generally for the purposes of the Trust or for any specific purpose connected therewith.

(6) That every Member who during his life is indebted or contracts to become indebted to the above named or pretend to pay to the creditors of the said Charles, Provided that none of the Trustees have or hold any property or interest in or to any of the said Companies or Partnerships, shall be liable to the Trustees for all moneys or expenses lawfully payable by or for the said Charles or his estate, to or by the said Trustees or any such person as the Trustees of the Trust shall be charged with the payment of, or to any of the said creditors or estate of the said Charles, and shall be liable to the Trustees of the said Trust for any moneys or expenses lawfully payable to the said Charles or his estate by or for the said Trustees and to the creditors of the said Charles, which the Trustees have been directed to pay to the said Charles or to the creditors of the said Charles, shall discharge and impair my control of the said assets of the said Charles, but over the said assets the said Trustees shall have jointly and severally a power to deal with the said assets of the Trust as they may think fit.

6. That the said property of the Trust, whenever conveyed, shall be conveyed to and for the payment of the debts of the Trust in full in the Memorandum of Association, and the said property shall be paid or transferred directly or indirectly by way of dividend to me or otherwise howsoever by way of gift to members of the Trust. Provided that no dividend shall be paid or payment in full of the debts of the Trust or to any creditor of the Trust or to any member of the Trust or other person in return for any services actually rendered to the Trust.

7. The fourth paragraph of the Memorandum is a condition on which has been granted by the Board of Trade to the Trust in pursuance of Section 19 of the Companies Act 1897.

8. If any Member of the Trust pay or receive any dividend he must do so in pursuance of the terms of the fourth paragraph of the Memorandum his liability shall be unlimited.

9. Every Member of the Trust undertakes to contribute to the assets of the Trust in the event of the same being wound up during his time that he is a Member or within one year afterwards for payment of the debts and liabilities of the Trust contracted before the time at which he ceases to be a Member and for the cost, charges and expense of winding up the same and for the adjustment of the rights of the Contributors amongst themselves such amount as may be required not exceeding five pounds or in case of his liability becoming unlimited such other amount as may be required in pursuance of the last preceding paragraph of this Memorandum.

10. If upon the winding up or dissolution of the Trust there remains after the satisfaction of all its debts and liabilities any property whatsoever, the same shall not be paid to or distributed among the Members of the Trust, but shall be given or transferred for the purpose of being held and maintained for the enjoyment and benefit of the public, or other charitable purpose, to some local authority or to some other institution or institutions having objects similar in their general character to the objects of the Trust, or be disposed of in some other manner for the public benefit, to be determined by the Members of the Trust at or before the time of dissolution, or in default thereof by such Judge of the High Court of Justice as may have or acquire jurisdiction in the matter.

9. True accounts shall be kept of the sums of money received and expended by the Trust, and the matter in respect of which such receipt and expenditure takes place, and of the property, credit and liabilities of the Trust, and, subject to any reasonable restrictions as to the time and manner of inspecting the same that may be imposed in accordance with the regulations of the Trust for the time being, shall be open to the inspection of the Member. Once at least in every year the accounts of the Trust shall be examined, and the correctness of the balance sheet ascertained by one or more properly qualified Auditor or Auditors.

We, the several persons whose names and addresses are subscribed, are desirous of being formed into a Trust in pursuance of the Memorandum of Association.
